Spice-Restaurant-Cafe

At a glance

Spice is a compact restaurant and cafe landing page. It introduces the business, guides visitors to food and drink menus, shows item descriptions and prices, and ends with visit information. The implementation is contained in one HTML file with its styling embedded in the page.

Restaurant Five Indian main dishes with a short description, image, and price.	Cafe & treats Six coffees, tea, and desserts, presented in the same menu-card pattern.	Visit section Opening hours and a prompt for the owner to add address and phone.

1. What visitors see

- Branded introduction: A deep red hero header names the restaurant, adds the tagline “Good Food. Great Moments.” and sets the warm, welcoming tone.
- Quick navigation: Home, Restaurant, Cafe & Treats, and Visit Us links take visitors directly to sections on the same page.
- Welcome message: A short intro explains the combined dining and cafe experience.
- Menu cards: Each dish or drink has an image, a descriptive alt label, a name, a one-line description, and a rupee-denominated price.
- Contact and footer: The final section displays daily hours and a placeholder for address and phone; the footer gives the business name and copyright year.

2. How the page was built

The page uses standard HTML for content and CSS for presentation. There is no JavaScript, framework, server logic, database, shopping cart, or online ordering flow. Its behavior focuses on browsing and in-page navigation.

Part	How it is used
Document structure	The HTML5 document sets English as its language, declares UTF-8 text encoding, and uses a viewport setting so the layout can scale on phones.
Semantic sections	Header, navigation, main, section, article, and footer elements make the page easier to understand and navigate. The navigation has an accessible label.
Visual system	CSS variables define the red, dark brown, cream, gold, ink, and muted colors. Reusable classes style menu sections, cards, prices, and contact information.
Layout	CSS Grid arranges menu cards in two columns on wider screens. Flexbox aligns each card image beside its text. A media query switches the menu to one column on narrower screens.

Images	Images are loaded from external image URLs. Each image includes alt text, and object-fit: cover crops images consistently inside fixed-size frames.

3. How the page works

The page is a single document that the browser reads from top to bottom. CSS rules turn that content into the restaurant's visual layout. The interactive parts are ordinary links that point to section IDs.

1

Browser loads the file

The browser reads the HTML, applies the embedded CSS, and requests the menu photos from their external hosts.

2

Visitor chooses a section

Clicking a navigation link such as "Cafe & Treats" follows its #cafe target. The browser scrolls to the matching section ID.

3

Visitor browses menu items

Each article groups a picture and its details. CSS Grid places the cards in columns; Flexbox keeps each image beside its description.

4

Layout adapts to screen size

At viewport widths of 650 pixels or less, navigation links can wrap, the menu becomes a single column, and card images become slightly smaller.

5

Visitor reaches visit details

The Visit Us link jumps to the contact section, where hours are shown along with the address and phone placeholder.

4. Design and responsive choices

The warm palette ties the restaurant and cafe together. Red marks headings and prices, cream softens the page, dark brown anchors navigation and footer, and gold adds accents. Centered headings and consistent cards make the menu easy to scan.

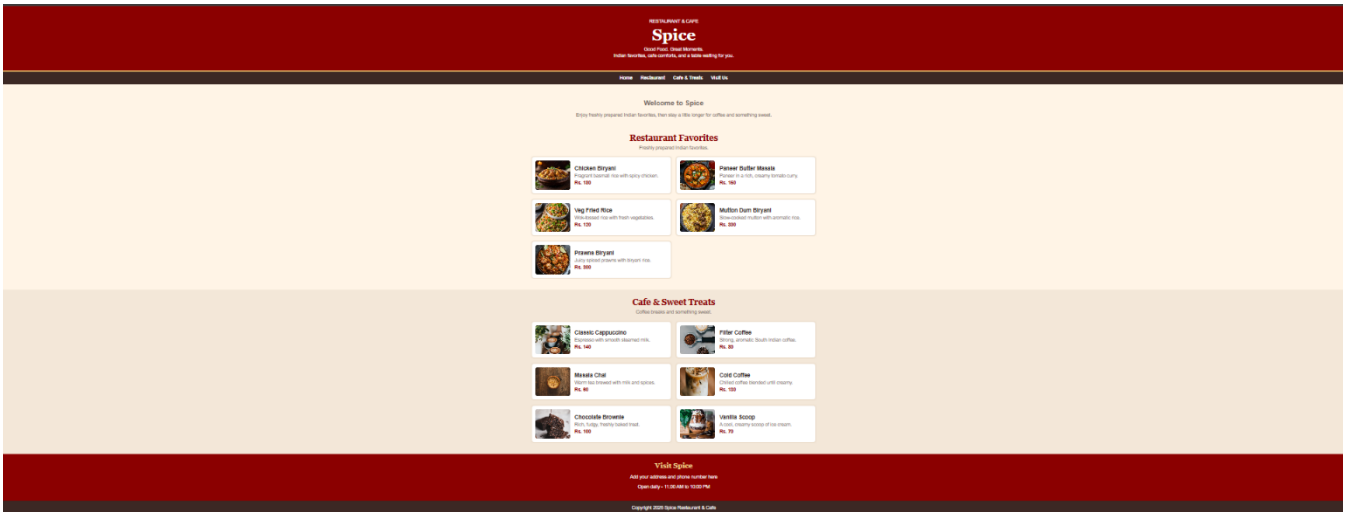

At 650px and below, the menu becomes one column and navigation wraps. CSS clamp() lets the "Spice" title scale with the screen.

5. What to customize next

- Replace "Add your address and phone number here" with the actual location and contact details.
- Check that all external image links remain available; remote images need an internet connection and may change or stopworking.
- If visitors need to place orders or make reservations, add a clearly linked form or booking service; the current page onlypresents information.
- Consider adding focus styles for keyboard users and testing text contrast and image loading on real devices.

Based on the supplied HTML source file.
